Charles Cist : Cincinnati in 1841: Its Early Annals and Future Prospects (Classic Reprint) before purchasing it in order to gage whether or not it would be worth my time, and all praised Cincinnati in 1841: Its Early Annals and Future Prospects (Classic Reprint):

Excerpt from Cincinnati in 1841: Its Early Annals and Future Prospects On the other hand, I knew that a work of this kind, to fulfil, in any just degree, the expectations it raised, must make its appearance within a reasonable period, and before the information it should afford might be presented in other channels to the public; and thus, with but four months' time for preparing this work, which most persons would probably think ample space for the purpose, I have found myself hurried in my employment, to a degree which must account for, if it may not excuse, that want of order in arrangement, and those defects in composition, which greater leisure would have corrected.
