Here's how to explain the real world when your students just don't want to listen or aren't aware of the importance of their education. This book for middle school teachers and counselors provides conversation starters for communicating the importance of college or career training, talking points and discussion questions to uncover students' interests, and quizzes and reflections to get students planning.

About the Author Sarah M. Klerk is an expert of workforce development. Sarah works with Workforce Strategy Center, where she helps communities develop career pathways. Prior to her work with WSC, Sarah worked at the Chicago Jobs Council to ensure access to employment and career advancement opportunities for people living in poverty. It was from Sarah's work at the W.E. Upjohn Institute for Employment Research, where she conducted research on workforce, economic, and educational development and worked with community stakeholders to improve the economy through educational and workforce development, that she gained a passion to help students understand the value of education. This was when she decided to develop Pass It On, which provides adults; teachers, educators, and counsellors, with engaging questions to stimulate dialogue with students about the connection among education, interests, and careers. Sarah earned her Master's of Public Policy from the University of Chicago.
